A: Turns out this is a known Xcode bug; e.g. And it has a workaround: So all you need to do is compile the app in the simulator instead of on a device and re-run. A: First of all, thanks to ricta for asking for the dimensions of this image! Here are the dimensions: Height: 1434px Width: 3291px It's an SVG image, so you can save it in various image formats. Q: Can Boto3 be used to run an AWS lambda function without a CLI? I'm looking to automate the deployment of AWS lambdas using the boto3 library, but the other party requires it to be packaged as a zip rather than run from the CLI. While it is possible to pull a Boto3 code snippet to run the lambda, we'd rather not have to perform this only to perform the boilerplate 'aws configure' step. Does anyone know if it is possible to have a custom manifest or service definition that includes the Boto3 library or whether we need to perform a small amount of pre-processing before passing it on to boto3? A: Boto3 and the AWS CLI have been built as completely separate tools. boto3 itself does not do anything that you can't do using the AWS CLI without it. boto3 is simply a library that you can use to access the AWS API in a python script. That being said, if you do not need the AWS CLI to interact with AWS, then you can simply use boto3 to call the Lambda API directly. It's not quite as simple as the AWS CLI, but if you need just a single script to deploy your functions, then this is the way to go. In order to build the API call to the Lambda API, we first need to know the action that we want to take. In your case, you want to "invoke an AWS Lambda function". This will be all we need to figure out the API request. Then you can use the boto3.client("lambda") function to make the API call. Here's an example of
